This is a language of Ethiopia. It is generally considered to be the official language of Ethiopia. It is also spoken by some people in neighboring countries such as Eritrea and Somalia. It is a branch of the Cushitic language family and is closely related to Somali.

The script is a modification of the Arabic script, with some letters added or modified to accommodate the sounds of the language. The script is written from right to left, as is traditional in Arabic-speaking countries.

The language is characterized by a rich vocabulary and a complex grammar.

The language is spoken by a large number of people, and it is one of the major languages in Ethiopia.

The language is also written in the Sidam script, which is a modified form of the Phoenician script used in the Sidam region of Ethiopia.

The language is also written in the Ge'ez script, which is a modified form of the Greek alphabet used in Ethiopia.

The language is used in a variety of contexts, including religious services, government documents, and educational materials.

The language is also used in a number of media, including television, radio, and print.

The language is also taught in schools and universities throughout Ethiopia.

The language is also used in a number of scholarly contexts, including research and written works.
